To Whom It May Concern,

Personally, I don't consider the latest settlement to be a very wise solution, as it seems to pave the way for Microsoft to have a larger market share. Education is one realm where Microsoft hasn't monopolized yet, and now they want to put Windows into more people's hands.

Though the educators have their own options of what computer to buy, Microsoft has said that the software would be free. It doesn't look like educators would have much of a choice.

Please consider enforcing a tighter and more adequate punishment. Microsoft doesn't want to admit guilt, but maybe this is time for them to do so?

Thank you,
Brian Warren
